Elysium: Brooklyn (OH) Public Library

It has been a year since Cleveland's Vampiric landscape changed drastically. Over that year Princes have risen and fallen, leaving Juliana in the Prince's seat. But even then- some things from a year ago have come to light as words finally are exchanged between Juliana and David after his departure. He admitted he and Sunny had more of a history than had been let on and that his decision to leave was not made lightly. That he knew he was not the leader they needed- that she was more suited for the role and that as much as it pained him to step away, that this was for the best. While his words answered what had been haunting Juliana since she ascended the throne and brought her some comfort, the entire metropolitan area was then thrown into a blackout, which left the vampires to once again be in the dark on many things including a new threat.

Aside from another disturbing cake being delivered with "It 1sn't F1n1sh3d" scrawled across it in blue frosting- The city remained in darkness, and then people's idle requests said aloud started being granted with deliberate inaccuracies. Juliana and her team went to handle a Kale related situation for a few moments in a back room of the Library, that left the rest of the Famarilla to their own devices only to come back to an empty room. Someone's idle wish had thrust some of the group into a harrowing situation where they were stuck fleeing to their havens as the sun rose, while others were able to depart normally as they had not been in the room at the time the wish had been made.

The group soon became aware there was an entity cursing them with their requests made aloud and that they were not the only group affected by this entity- that the Hunters and Garou too had also been plagued by this issue. The group then did their best to focus and keep those thoughts inside – only to find it increasingly more tempting to blurt them out. Frustrations built as the group tried to figure out who or what was causing this- an how to stop it.
